Cod fish

There is a story told about a problem that some fishermen had years ago trying to ship the codfish that were caught in the Northeast. If the fish were shipped frozen they arrived at the market, but they had lost much of their flavor. When the fish were shipped live, they arrived flavorless and would not sell because they were soft and mushy. Neither was acceptable for the fishermen to ship the fish across the country. After many possible solutions, finally one was tried that worked. They shipped the fish alive across the country, but put catfish in the bins where these live fish were stored. The reason: the catfish is the natural enemy of the codfish. During the entire journey the fish were swimming for their lives. The end result: they arrived fresh. The pressure made them better. I think it is good for us to remember that while life is rugged at times, there is something else that is going on. God is in the process of making us different, better, and more usable. It doesn't mean that the pressure goes away, but it does mean the pressure has a purpose. Hope lives when we begin to understand that.
